Mr. Will E. Dunn, of Augusta, found, Saturday, a swarm of bees in a hollow tree, from which he obtained sixty-two pounds of first-class honey.

The horse stolen from John Wells, at Vienna, was found at Mr. Mosher's, ten miles dictant from the place of theft, having been left there by the thief on the eveolog of the 24th. The wagon, harness and robe were found all right. Mr. Wells is the owner of two horses, one of which is a superior roadster, the other being quite inferior in this direction. It is supposed that the thief, through mistake, stole the wrong horse and when finding his error abandoned the team with which be could hardly expect to escape.

Mrs. Chloc Hatch was born in Lovell, in the year 1816, and was consequently past seventy-two years of age at the time of her death, which occurred recently in Pennsylvania. She was married in 1842, to Thomas P. Hatch. He afterwards gut into bad company and deserted his wife. Mrs. Hatch was a very industrious as well as a good Christian woman, and supported hersel and her family, with the aid of a small amount of property which she received at the death of one of her grownupsons, until her health failed and abecame dependent upon others for support. Mrs. Hatch's will, which has been admitted to probate, gives each of her four children $1 each. The remainder of her property—about $2,400, pension money recently received—she divides between Mrs. Hawes and Mrs. Burkey, who have befriended her. It is said that her children would not allow her to live with them, and she accordingly cut them off; he found a home with Mirs. Hawes and Mrs. Burkey, whom she so generously remembered there with the will.

May.

The mechanics employed at the yard of the New Englaud Shipbullding Company, at Bath, were notified, Saturday, that a cut of twenty-five cents would be made in their wages next Thursday-morning. The pay of the workmen has been, during the summer and fall, from $1.50 to $2 per day. Naturally, there is no little kicking against the proposed reduction, and there are a few who threatened to leave and go to other cities, where it is said carpenters are paid higher wages than they are here. It is believed, however, that a greater part of the men will submit to the cut down. A reduction in the other yards of the city is expected to follow.

Watter May 1. Tozier gave a thoughtful and patient crosponse, briefly reviewing the bap-pile of himself and companion, and clearly evincing the joy which this gathering of friends gave to them. Appropriate remarks were made by Jasper D. Cochrack.

Greatly Troubled by Its Own Evidence

It is of little profit to discuss my ques tion with a paper like the Bangor Conner e if which flops about so much that even the editor himself does not seem to know just what he is among at The Commer ral started out to boom commercial union with C in id and in order to show the real be cuties of the proposition published a lot of it terviews with Canadians, one of which gave the views of Mr Alexander Gibson a leading business man of that Province Of course Mr Gib on was quick to see the great idvintiges that would accrue to Canada from unrestri ted trade with the States and set forth those advantages in I lain unim takable language Among ther things he cited the strong probabil ity that as Cinada already furnishes us with many skins and considerable bank the manufacturers of boots and shoes under as pr po ed arrangement would transfer their plants to funda and engage in busi ness there where they would be able to re place the r high price labor with the cheap labor of (anada | This is a phase of the qu shon that d rently affects. Bangor bust ne s and laboring men and lik Whie referred to it a affording a pretty good ar niment why commercial union would not be received with much favor here, whereupon our fickle neighbor at once under takes to d credit its own evidence by claiming that there is no danger of such in emergency as that pictured by Mr Cibson As it was one of the principal leens is signed by him, however, in demonstrating that commercial union would be a great blessing for Canada' the haste with which the Commercial en deavors to distract attention from this de lightful prospect to our city as the result s still stronger light the impra ticability of the whole scheme as affecting the interests of the State, which of course, is at work on his message, and it is expected ery question Mr Gibson is equally than his last explicit and shows that the one object which actuates Canada is to get accesss to the United States There is no call for a cominis sion to settle this question as we have thready paid too dearly for an ornamental luxury of that kind The gentlemen who ir row acting in that capacity were ap politied in open defiance of the expressed will of Congress and in all probability the Administration will be called upon to Explain its action when the Senate convenes As to the Commercial's statement if at the tariff does not benefit wages it is sufficient abswer to say that the intelligent Friday Evening, December 2d at 7 30 O'clock workingmen know better, a fact fully proven during the Congressional hearing when the free trade friends of our evening contemporary were engaged in an effort to override the projective policy under which this G unity I as made such unprecedented A Lot of Fine Pocket Knives, Scisprogres there was a time when the working classes were deceived by such silly talk as that indulged in by the Com viercial but happily it has gone by and they are now doing their own thinking

Clinching a Lie

The New York Evening Post in a fit of desperation having put forth the absurd statement that the President recalled his letter indersing Col Fellows for District Attorney of New York as soon as he learned what a bad man Fellows is, the Sundisposes of the deliberately coined falsehood in a most vigorous and at the same time convincing manner Its Washington cor respondent has been investigating the matter and declares that Mr Cleveland not Shawis. only stands by every syllable of the letter, but warmly congratulated Col Fellows on his election when he called to thank the President in person for his very effective aid in the campaign Of the letter the Sun

correspondent writes

"Mr Cleveland had been informed by Mr Edward Coper and other leading Democrats that he was being classed in an unwarranted manner by the New York World and the Mugwumps as an opponent of ol Fellows The President at once write to Mr Cooper the now famous Fellows letter On the same day he wrote shother letter to Mr George H. Forster, regretting his inability to attend the Tammapy railfication meeting, in which he carpressed an earnest wish for the success of the entire local Democratic tieset. Before the Tammany letter was made public Mr. Cooper telegraphed to the President asking for permission to give the letter he (Mr. Cieveland at once gave his consent to the publication. The next morning the letter to Tammany Hall appeared in the newspapars Mr. Cooper kept his letter from the President until the following night, in order to first read it at a meeting of the Young Men's Independent Club It was then given to the press The suggestion was made to Mr. Cooper by some of his friends, after the Tammany letter was published, that perhaps it was not necessary to make public Mr Cleveland's letter to him also, but the President never asked for nor desired its suppression He resisted tremendous Mugwump pressure all through the campaign, and remained stead fast to the end!

The story of the Post seems to have been deliberate fabrication to break the force of the President's enthusiastic support of I'weed a chum, as such action on his part The Democrats and the Tariff was, of course, entirely at variance with The tariff question is looming up in the halo of reform with which the Mugformidable proportions to the Democrats wumps have sought for the past year or now assembling in Washington, and the two to surround the Administration, but boastful talk of the free traders grows the Post should learn ere long that no beautifully less as the time for action aparound of lying will disguise the fact that proteins. The fact is the Democrats, all Grover Cleveland is now devoting his en though they have a great deal to say tire energies toward making himself solid about what they propose to do are incom- with the "machine on the spolls basis as INCW York Tribune 1 Here is that ancient and threadbare un form or more properly speaking, free truth again, "The Republican party is trade, but when it comes to a decisive test essentially a sectional party and never has they lack the courage of their convictions been anything else. It has not only est maily on the eve of the Presidential neglected the millions of the South but it contest A few months ago when the never indorses a party platform without emerger c) was just so far removed the expressing a suspicion of them." This is free trade leaders were outspoken in their the assertion of the New York Herald, but now even the New York Evening of the South, who are they? sentatives who favor it are quite numerous.

The Millions of the South

Mr. Whitthorne, of Tennessee, thinks the government can support the telegraph system as it did the postal system, beginning with wires between the large cities.

Representative Jackson, of Pennsylvania, lavors an experimental line between Philadelphia and New York.

Mr. Brown, of Indiana, will probably support a well considered scheme.

Mr. Whiting, of Michigan, will favor the project of starting on a sound basis.

When it was reported to this station that a car had been broken into, suspicious were at once directed to the same crowd which has been causing trouble during the summer and fall, but its members were not sufficiently known, individually, to warrant arrests being made before further evidence was secured against them.

Inspector "Lon" Harriman was detailed to look up the circumstances of the case, and he, assisted by Officer Stetson, of station 5, went to work yesterday morning. The officers, after a most difficult search in the swamps before mentioned, found empty cases, tobacco buckets and cigar boxes, and also abox containing bottles of sarsaparilla. TERRIBLE DEATH OF A LADY.

Strock by the Pole of a Team in Park Square.

BOSTON, Nov. 29. About 5.30 yesterday afternoon a pair of horses attached to a heavy team owned by D. D. Fisk were standing in the freight yard of the Providence Railroad, when some one threw down a heavy plank, frightening the horses. They ran away through Columbus avenue and Park square, where they struck and knocked down an unknown lady, who is thought to have been on her way to the Providence depot, instantly killing her. The pole struck her under the inw, splitting it open and crushing in her face and nose. The horses continued on to Boylston street, where they stopped running, and were secured by Patroiman Clark, of station 4, who was unaware of the necident. Struck by the Pole of a Team in Park Square

The police ambulance was called, and the body removed to Undertaker Jones' shop on Lagrange street, where Medical Examiner Draper viewed it, and deemed an inquest unnecessary. The remains were left there for identification.

There was nothing about the lady to indicate who she was or where she came from. She was of medium complexion, 5 feet 1 inch in helght, weighed about 110 pounds; had round, full face, false teeth, and light brown hair, and was apparently about thirty-live years old. Her cothes were of the finest quality, both her inner and outer garments, and she was dressed in a dark blue wrapper with a panel of red or muroon colored plush, extending down the front, front the neck to the hem. She had also a blue waterproof with a hood and tassel, a bluck beaded honnet, trimmed with maroon relevet and black triumed with maroon velvet and black satta bows, on the inside of which was sewed a line of carled hair matching her own. She wore a flannel petticoat, button boots and rubbers.

"Mme. Gerster felt that though she sang much better in New Haven than at the Academy, she was not yet in a condi-tion to do herself or Mr. Abbey justice. It was therefore mutually agreed that she would better rest for a while. There is only the kindest feeling between them.

Mr. Abbey has behaved most liberally and has assured Mme. Gerster that he will and has assured Mme. Gerster that he will resume the concerts as soon as she desires to do so. It is, of course, a great grief to her that any stoppage has been necessitated, the more so because she did not rust to her own judgment, but had the assurance of the great teacher, Mme. Marchest, that her voice was in perfect order. And indued it was so. In a room and before friends, she sings as well as ever. There is nothing the matter with her voice-producing organs. The trouble is nervousness. When she gets before an audience, she loses control, and her throat seems to to close up. On the Saturday before she appeared, she sang in this house and all appeared, she sang in this nouse and ac-who heard her agreed that she was never in better voice. As to the cause and dura-

COUNTESS NARONA.

He rose late the next-morning. Inquiring for his Parisian friends, he was informed that both the French gentlemen had loft for Milan. As he crossed the hall on his way to the restaurant he noticed the head porter chalking the numbers of the rooms on some articles of luggage which were waiting to go up stairs. One trunk attracted his attention by the extraordinary number of old traveling labels left on it. The porter was marking it at the moment—and the number was "18A." Francis instantly looked at the card fastened on the lid. It here the common English name, "Airs. James?" He at once inquired about the lady. She had arrived early that morning, and she was then in the reading room. Looking into the room he discovered a lady in it alone. Advancing a little nearer a lady in it alone. Advancing a little nearer the found himself face to face with the countess.

Sho was seated in a dark corner with her head down and her arms crossed over her bosom. "Yes," she said, in a tone of weary impatience, before Francis could speak to her, "I thought it best not to wair for you—I determined to get here before anybody else could take the room."

"Have you taken it for loug?" Francis selve!

asked.
"You told me Miss Lockwood would be here in a week's time. I have taken it for a week."

"What has Miss Lockwood to do with it?"

"She has everything to do with it—she must steep in the room. I shall give the room up to her when she comes here."

Francis began to understand the superstitious purpose that she had in view. "Are you, an educated woman, really of the same opinion as my sister's maid?" he exclaimed. "Assuming your absurd superstition to be a serious thing, you are taking the wrong means to prove it true. "If I and my brother and sister have seen nothing, how should Agues Lockwood discover what was not revealed to us? She is only distantly related to the Montbarrys—she is only our cousin."

"She was nearer to the heart of the Montbarry who is dead than any of you," the countess answered, sternly. "To the last day of his life my miserable husband repented his desertion of her. She will see what mone of you have seen—she shall have the room."

Francis listened, utterly at a loss to account for the motives that animated her. "I don't see what interest you have in trying this extraordinary experiment," he said.

"It is my interest not to try it! It is my interest to fly from Venice and never set eyes on Agnes Lockwood or any of your family again!"

"What provents you from doing that?" week." "What has Miss Lockwood to do with it?"

on Agnes Lockwood or any of your heady ngain?"
"What provents you from doing that?"
She started to her feet and looked at him wildly, "I know no more what provents me than you do!" she burst out, "Some will that is stronger than mine drives me out to my destruction in spite of my own self." She saiddenly sat down again and waved her hand for him to go. "Leave me to my thoughts."

for him to go. "Lenve me," she said. "Leave me to my thoughts." Francis left her, firmly persuaded by this time that she was out of her senses. For the nest of the day he saw nothing of her. The night, so far us he knew, passed quietly. The next morning he breakfasted early, determined to wait in the restaurant for the appearance of the countess. She came in and ordered her breakfast quietly, looking dull, worn and self absorbed, as she had looked when he last saw her. He hastened to her table and asked if anything had happened in the night. thing," she answered

"You have rested as well as usual?"
"Quite as well as usual. Have you had any sale is coming? Have you heard when sale is coming?"

"I have had no letters. Are your experience of last right not altered the opinion which you expressed to me yesterday?"

"Not in the least,"

expressed to me yesterday?

"Not in the least."

The momentary gleam of animation which had crossed her face when she questioned him about Agues thed out of it again when he answered her. She looked, she spoke, she cat her breakfast with a vacant resignation, like a woman who had done with inpres, done with interest, done with everything but the mechanical movements and instincts of life. Francis went out on the customary traveler's pilertinage to the shrines of Tition and and Tintoreto. After some hours of absence he found a letter waiting for him when he got back to the butel. It was written by his brother Henry, and it recommended him to return to Milan immediately. The proprietor of a French theater, recently arrived from Venice, was trying to induce the famous dancer whom Francis had engaged to break faith with him and accept a higher salary.

She wore no veil. As she ascended to the door of the botel the countess (sying hor through an opera glass) noticed that she paused to look at the outside of the building, and that her face was very pale.

CHAPTER XXI Lord and Lady Mortburry were received by the housekeeper, the manager being ab-sent for a day or two on business connected with the affairs of tim hotel.

with the affairs of the hotel.

The rooms reserved for the travelers, on the first floor, were three in number, consisting of two bedrooms opening into each other, and communicating on the left with a drawing room. Complete so far, the arrangements proved to be less satisfactory in reference to the third bedroom required for Agnes and for the eldest daughter of Lord Montherry, who usually slept with her on their travels. The bed chamber on the right of the drawing room was already occupied by an English widow lady. Other bed chambers at the other end of the corridor, were also like in every case. There was accordingly, no albeinative but to place at the disposal of Agnesia a con-

Having made this startling announcement, Henry processed to inform his brother that Lord and Lady Montbarry, with Agnes and the children, would harrive in Venice in three days more, "They know nothing of our adventures at the lotel," Henry wrote, "and they have telegraphied to the manager for the accommodation that they want. There would be something absurdly superstitions in our giving them a warning which would frighten the ladies and children out of the best hotal in Venice. We shall be a strong party this time—too strong a party for ghosts! I shall meet the travelers on their arrival, of course, and try my luck again at what you call the haunted hote! Arthur Barville and his wife have already get as far on their way as Trent; and two of the lady's relations have arranged to accompany them on the journey to Venice."

Naturally indignant at the conduct of his Parisian colleague, Francis made his preparations for returning to Milan by the train of that day.

On his way out he asked the manager if his brother's telegram had here received. The telegram had arrived, and, to the surprise of Francis, the rooms were already reserved. It thought you would refuse to let any more of the family into the house," he said, satirically. The manager answered (with the due dash of respect) in the same tone. "No. 13A' is safe, sir, in the occupation of a stranger. I am the servant of the company, and I dare not turn money out of the hotel."

Hearing this, Francis said goodby—und said nothing more. He was ashamed to asknowledge it to himself, but he feit an irresistible curiosity to know what would happen when Agnes arrived at the hotel. Besides, "Mrs. James" had reposed confidence in him. He got into his gondola, respecting the confidence of "Més. James."

Toward overling, on the third day, Lord Montbarry and his traveling companions arrived, punctual to their appointment.

"Mrs. James," sitting at the window of her room, watching for them, saw the new lord land from the gondola first. He banded his wite from the steps. The three children were next committed to his care. Last of all, Agnes uppeared in the little back doorway of the gondola cabin; and, taking Lord Mont-

The housekeeper politely hinted that it was impossible for her to sek other travelers to give up their rooms. On the retirament of the housekeeper Lady Montbarry noticed that Agnes canted hersolf apart, feeling apparently no intorest in the question of the bedrooms. Was sie ill? No; she felt a little unnerved by the railway journey, and that was all. Henring this, Lord Montbarry proposed that she should go cut with him and try the experiment of half an hour's walk in the cool air. Agnes gladly accepted the suggestion. They directed their steps toward the square St. Mark, so as to onjoy the breeze blowing over the lagoon. It was the first visit of Agnes to Venice. The fascination of the wonderful city of the waters exerted its full influence over her sensitive anatom of the wonderful city of the waters exerted its full influence over her sensitive nature. The proposed half hour of the walk had passed away and was fast expanding to half an hour more before Lord Montbarry could persuade his companion to remember that dinner was waiting for them. As they roturned, passing under the colonnaie, neither of them noticed a lady in deep mourning loitering in the open space of the square. She started as she recognized Agnes walking with the new Lord Montbarry, besitated for a moment and then followed them, at a discreet distance, back to the hotel.

Lady Montbarry received Agues in high spirits with news of an event which had happened in her absence.

She had not laft the hotel more than ten minutes before a little note in pencil was brought to Lady Montbarry by the housel keeper. The writer proved to be no less a person than the widow lady who occupied the room on the other side of the drawing room which her ladyship had vainly hoped to secure for Agnes. Writing under the name of Mrs. James, the polite widow explained that she had heard from the housekeeper of the disappointment experienced by Lady Montbarry in the matter of the rooms.
